Research on curcumin: A meta-analysis of potentially malignant disorders

ABSTRACT

Introduction: Turmeric has been described in ayurveda, and is referred by different names in different cultures, the active principle called curcumin or diferuloylmethane, has been shown to exhibit numerous activities. Extensive research over the last half century has revealed several important functions of curcumin. It binds to a variety of proteins and inhibits the activity of various kinases. By modulating the activation of various transcription factors, curcumin regulates the expression of inflammatory enzymes, cytokines, adhesion molecules, and cell survival proteins. Various preclinical, clinical, and animal studies suggest that curcumin has potential as an antitumor, anti-invasive, and antiangiogenic, as a mediator of chemoresistance, chemopreventive, and as a therapeutic agent. Thus, curcumin a spice once relegated to the kitchen shelf has moved into the clinic and may prove to be "Curcumin."

Methodology and Objectives: The focus of this publication is to provide research on curcumin with scientific publications on curcumin indexed in PubMed, Google J-Gate including systematic reviews, randomized controlled trials (RCTs), observational studies, or case series reports for various potentially malignant disorders (PMDs), with special attention to studies on oral submucous fibrosis. This research will be valuable in terms of identifying opportunities to provide recommendations for future research, in terms of the populations to research, the types of interventions needed, the types of outcomes to be measured, the study designs needed, to initiate a pathway for a low-cost research plan for future clinical trials in this field with an emphasis on conducting studies in regions of the world where PMDs are prevalent.

Conclusions: There is a lacuna for scientific review of curcumin for PMDs specially for OSMF. Appropriate therapeutic interventions are needed for the initial, intermediate, and advanced stages of the disease. High-quality RCTs should be initiated.

KEY WORDS: Curcumin, leukoplakia, lichen planus, oral submucous fibrosis, potentially malignant disorders

INTRODUCTION

The belief that plant remedies were natural and superior to man-made synthetics and the reference to certain historical use by different cultures. Curcumin is a naturally occurring phytochemical and an extract of turmeric. Turmeric is comprised of a group of three curcuminoids: Curcumin (diferuloylmethane), demethoxycurcumin, and bisdemethoxycurcumin as well as volatile oils (turmerone, atlantone, and zingiberone), sugars, proteins, and resins. Curcumin is a lipophilic polyphenol that is nearly insoluble in water but is quite stable in the acidic pH of the stomach. Animal studies have shown curcumin is rapidly metabolized, conjugated in the liver, and excreted in the feces, therefore, having limited systemic bioavailability. Suppression of the inflammatory response by curcumin as discussed in the preclinical studies involves the inhibition of the induction of COX-1, COX-2, iNOS, and production of cytokines such as interferon- γ . Curcumin also been shown to scavenge O_2 and OH $^\cdot$ radicals showing curcumin can have both pro-oxidant or anti-oxidant effects depending on the doses and the chemical environment (e.g., availability of free Cu^{2+} ions). Another free radical, NOS also plays an important role as oxidant, inflammatory agent, and immune-modulator. Extensive in vitro and in vivo data have paved the way for curcumin to become the subject of clinical trials. Evidence of efficacy has been derived from animal models or small clinical trials. There is only finite data supporting the use of curcumin in phase III trials with specific diseases. However, for the vast majority of conditions, additional early-phase studies are required to justify larger trials determining efficacy. Hence, this systematic review of curcumin was planned to ABSTRACT: Introduction: Oral submucous fibrosis (OSMF) is a potentially malignant disorder carrying a high risk of malignant transformation. A wide range of treatment modalities have been proposed for OSMF but none have proved curative or reduced the morbidity significantly. In-vitro and in-vivo studies suggested curcumin as an anticancer, antioxidant and anti-inflammatory agent. Thus based on this literature survey the study was undertaken. Aim: To evaluate the efficacy of curcumin for the treatment of clinical stage 2 OSMF patients and to compare it with patients receiving placebo drugs. Study Design and Sample Size: A randomized single blinded placebo controlled clinical trial was conducted in 100 clinical stage 2 OSMF patients with clinically and histopathologically confirmed diagnosis. Materials and Methods: 100 clinical stage 2 patients selected for the study were divided into 2 groups with 50 patients each. Group 1 patients were given placebo capsules. Group 2 patients were given curcumin capsules of 500 mg. The primary outcome measures were to note the subjective symptoms and objective parameters. These parameters were analyzed at baseline and 6th month. Patients were also evaluated histopathologically after 6 months. ANOVA, students t test and p value were utilized for statistical inferences. Results: Patients in group 2 showed statistically significant improvement in all the subjective signs and symptoms and histopathological changes with p value of < 0.001 when compared with group 1 patients. Conclusion: It is evident from the study that curcumin holds good promise in the treatment of OSMF.

INTRODUCTION: OSMF was first described by Schwartz in 1952 as a fibrosing condition in five Indian women and in Kenya he called it as atrophica idiopathica tropica¹.

Subsequently Joshi in 1953 is credited to have coined the term Oral submucous fibrosis. Epidemiological studies show a unique prevalence of this premalignant condition in India and South East Asia¹. It has a specific geographic distribution and predominantly affects the Asians². Pindborg has summed up the clinical and histopathological features in his definition for OSMF as "an insidious chronic disease affecting oral mucosa or any part of the oral cavity and occasionally extending into pharynx and Esophagus, although occasionally

The wisdom and scientific credentials of curcumin in the Ayurvedic and Chinese systems of medicine have been corroborated by numerous studies conducted over the past 30 years. Curcumin (diferuloylmethane), an orange-yellow component of turmeric or curry powder, is a polyphenol natural product isolated from the rhizome of the plant Curcuma longa. In recent years, extensive in vitro and in vivo studies suggested curcumin has anticancer, antiviral, antiarthritic, anti-amyloid, antioxidant, and anti-inflammatory properties. The underlying mechanisms of these effects are diverse and appear to involve the regulation of various molecular targets, including transcription factors (such as nuclear factor- κ B), growth factors (such as vascular endothelial cell growth factor), inflammatory cytokines (such as tumor necrosis factor, interleukin 1 and interleukin 6), protein kinases (such as mammalian target of rapamycin, mitogen-activated protein kinases, and Akt) and other enzymes (such as cyclooxygenase 2 and 5 lipooxygenase). Although several different steroids and NSAIDs (such as celecoxib, aspirin, ibuprofen, phenylbutazone, etc) are approved for treatment of inflammatory conditions, most of them have side effects, especially when consumed over long periods of time. Thus, due to its efficacy and regulation of multiple targets, as well as its safety for human use, curcumin has received considerable interest as a potential therapeutic agent for the prevention and/or treatment of various potentially malignant disorders, malignant diseases, arthritis, allergies, Alzheimer's disease, and other inflammatory illnesses. This review paper in depth attempts to describe various molecular targets, anticancer properties and other activities of this wonder drug with a note on safety and pharmacology.

KEYWORDS: Curcumin Ayurvedic and Chinese systems, anticancer, antiviral, antiarthritic, anti-amyloid.

INTRODUCTION

Curcumin (diferuloylmethane) is the chief component of the spice turmeric and is derived from the rhizome of the East Indian plant Curcuma longa. Curcuma longa is a member of the Zingiberaceae (ginger) family of botanicals and is a perennial plant that is native to South east Asia.^[1] Turmeric contains a class of compounds known as the curcuminoids, comprised of curcumin, demethoxycurcumin and bisdemethoxycurcumin.

ABSTRACT

Introduction: Oral submucous fibrosis (OSMF) is a potentially malignant disorder carrying a high risk of malignant transformation. A wide range of treatment modalities have been proposed for oral submucous fibrosis but none have proved curative or reduced the morbidity significantly. Very few researches have shown the efficacy of curcumin as targeted local drug delivery in oral submucous fibrosis. Hence the study was planned. In vitro & in vivo studies suggested curcumin as an anticancer, antioxidant & anti-inflammatory agent. Thus based on this literature survey the study was undertaken.

Aim: To evaluate the efficacy of 10% curcumin mucoadhesive gel for the treatment of clinical stage 2 OSMF patients.

Study design & Sample size: This is an in-vivo single arm clinical study. The study sample included a total of 50 clinical stage 2 OSMF patients with clinically & histopathologically confirmed diagnosis.

Materials & methods: Patients were given 10% curcumin mucoadhesive gel and were instructed to apply topically two times per day making a daily dose of 1 gram. The primary outcome measures were to note the subjective symptoms and objective parameters. Subjective & objective parameters were entered as scores in the proforma. All measurements were taken by the same examiner to avoid observer variability. These parameters were analyzed at baseline, 15th day, 30th day, 45th day, 60th day & 75th day, 90th day, 4th month, 5th month and 6th month. Patients were also evaluated histopathologically after 6 months.

Statistical analysis: The data collected were tabulated and analyzed. The difference in scores at 15th day, 30th day, 45th day, 60th day, 75th day, 90th day, 4th month, 5th month and 6th month were compared by paired t test. 'p' value of 0.05 or less was utilized for statistical significance.

Results: Patients showed statistically significant improvement in all the subjective signs & symptoms, clinical staging & histopathological grading with p value of < 0.05.

Conclusion: It is evident from the study that curcumin holds good promise in the treatment of OSMF.

INTRODUCTION

Oral submucous fibrosis (OSMF) has been described as "an insidious chronic disease affecting any part of the oral cavity and sometimes the pharynx. Although, occasionally preceded by and/or associated with vesicle formation, it is always associated with a juxta-epithelial inflammatory reaction followed by a fibro-elastic change of the lamina propria, with epithelial atrophy leading to stiffness of the oral mucosa and causing trismus and inability to eat"[1]. Many treatment modalities in current practice for OSMF are circumstantial and most of the studies which tested various therapies lacked good design and planning. Hence, need of a good research and awareness still pertains to clinicians as well as patients [2].

Polyphenols play an important role in the maintenance of health and prevention of diseases. Among polyphenols, the most widely used substance is Curcumin. Curcumin is considered as safe, non-toxic and effective alternative for many traditional drugs because of its effects on various systems and therapeutic properties. Local drug delivery may provide a more targeted and efficient drug-delivery option than systemic delivery for diseases of the oral mucosa. Oral diseases can be effectively treated by local therapeutic approaches, due to the ease of the oral cavity accessibility [3].

ABSTRACT

Introduction: Oral submucous fibrosis (OSMF) is a potentially malignant disorder carrying a high risk of malignant transformation. A wide range of treatment modalities have been proposed for oral submucous fibrosis but none have proved curative or reduced the morbidity significantly. Shankar and co authors have reviewed the most common mucosal diseases and identified the current treatment approaches systemically and locally. Systemic bioavailability of curcumin is less. Local drug delivery may provide a more targeted and efficient drug-delivery option than systemic delivery for diseases of the oral mucosa.
